Flux party announce their lead Western Australian candidate: Richard Thomas

With the 2016 Federal Election Campaign ramping up, the newly registered political party, Flux has announced its lead candidate for Western Australia, paramedic Richard Thomas. Flux isn't like a traditional political party, it has just one policy: to upgrade democracy. Flux aims to do this by handing the power back to the people and letting them wield total power over the Flux Senators using an app.

"Flux enables Flux-App holders to consider each and every issue. They can vote "yes" or "no" in the traditional sense, or they can pass their vote onto someone they trust to represent them". A powerful feature for voters, is that Flux embodies "issues-based" direct democracy. Flux-App users can trade a vote on an issue that does not interest or concern them, for a credit to vote in a later issue that does," Nathan Spataro, the party's leader said.

For Flux Candidate Richard Thomas, a 45-year-old paramedicine academic, who joined the party in February 2016, Flux was a long awaited breakthrough.

"Frankly, I have been fed up for decades with a broken political system that only engages the people before an election and then forgets about them immediately afterwards with politicians who actually benefit from a disengaged voter base. Flux is a viable system that will guarantee people have a real say, not just a token voice in how the country is run," Mr Thomas said. "Flux has only one fixed policy going into this election, 'to upgrade democracy'".

Richard only makes only one promise to the people of Australia, and publicly announces, that if he can't keep that promise, he will resign.

"My job, if elected, will be to represent the will of the people. I do have my own political views, but for the sake of a better democracy, I pledge to put my own views and opinions aside, and only do as the people tell me to do, through the Flux App," Mr Thomas said.

The Flux-App is a highly secure method of voting, and one which will make its Senators one hundred percent accountable for how they vote.

"I am an ordinary Australian, sick of political spin, double-talk and lies" Mr Thomas said, "whilst my conscience won't let me go against my word, in voting exactly as I am instructed, the Flux system has inbuilt safeguards to prevent me doing so," Mr Thomas said.

Flux is not just a party for Gen Y and millennials, with increasing numbers of people in their fifties and sixties also joining.

“Flux is using a strong social media campaign to engage voters to put us first on their senate ticket, before the majors and one issue parties” the party leader Nathan Spataro said, “If elected, Richard will be turning to the people on each and every bill before Parliament for instruction how to vote in the Senate”.
